Collector's corner

What is a collector? After all, people collect a wide variety of things, from the obvious ones like stamps, coins or autographs, to less common ones, such as beer bottles, bus tickets or match boxes.

The economies of some small countries rely on the sale of colourful stamps. Some collectors spend hours looking through junk shops or car boot sales and build up a collection for a few pounds, while collectors of antiques, fine china, or paintings might spend thousands of pounds on a new acquisition. Some people collect as an investment, but most do it for fun. Collecting is basically illogical. If you simply want to listen to Elvis Presley's first record, you can get a copy on Amazon. A collector, however, will want to own an original 1955 disc, complete with original sleeve and label. And will be prepared to pay for it.

What makes an item valuable?

Rarity and condition are the most important factors. A coin or stamp which is worth hundreds in mint condition might be worth only a few pounds in average or poor condition.

What should you collect?

Most collectors begin acquiring things that interest them. The most valuable items are often things which are widely available, but which are usually thrown away after use, such as Coca-Cola bottles or toy cars. An interesting collection can be started very cheaply.
