Food tourism in the Republic of Ireland

Tourism Ireland is keen to attract more visitors by developing food tourism. The number of British visitors has declined. However, the European market is strong, with many visitors from France and Germany. The growth of this specialised niche market in Ireland is being threatened by Scotland which has a good reputation for its food tourism.

Ireland has a traditional and unique food culture and many tourists currently enjoy Irish cuisine in its hotels, restaurants and cafes. Fast-food outlets are also popular, but these do not serve traditional food. There are opportunities to attract many more people to food and culinary events, conferences and even tours to sample regional speciality dishes. Tourism Ireland has decided to carry out joint marketing meetings with various hospitality and food industry representatives and it is hoped that this will increase visitor awareness and satisfaction.
